Bah, this game defines EXACTLY the reasons that people seem to despise RPG maker games that continue to flood Steam. Even at $1.49, it makes you feel like the developer is laughing all the way to the bank. Too many things make absolutely no sense 45 minutes into the game, which was much further then I wanted to play this. Boring, uninspired, senseless plot makes this project feel like the developer rushed to push out a game for Steam to try and make a quick dollar, err or $1.49.

I give the game credit for some pretty good random scares, sound effects or monsters that dart wildly in front of or behind you can surprise you. However this just feels like a tacked on gimmick to try and convince you this game is worthy of a good RPG maker game.. it's NOT! To the Moon is a great RPG maker game, this is just more RPG Maker "muck" that leaves you shaking your head and asking "why?" over and over.

My score is a 24%, even at the price tag of $1.49. I want more then my $1.49 back, how can I request a refund of my TIME as well through Steam?!?

Stay away, even at 90% off and 14 cents, this game isn't worth it. Sorry dev., try again pal, and next time don't try to push out a game in a week, eh?. The Forgotten Forest, developed by Dylan Wentz, is one of many RPGMaker games purchasable on Steam\u2026 but if you\u2019re looking for a scary and (or) dramatic experience crafted on this engine, I\u2019d say you\u2019re better off looking elsewhere.

You play as Rebecca, a simple girl leading a simple life. With her mother\u2019s death, she finds comfort in her father, who seems more than capable of raising a child. But, as the story quickly unfolds, that\u2019s where things go downhill: not just for our protagonists, but for the game as a whole.

You see, The Forgotten Forest is anything but subtle. Almost instantly, in the midst of a school day, Rebecca\u2019s class is greeted by a strange old woman whom none of the children know. She proceeds to tell the students of a cursed forest nearby\u2026 and that\u2019s it. That intro alone sums up the style of this game\u2019s story.

I\u2019s very random.

Plot twists and conflicts will just spring out of nowhere, and before you can blink, something else has already happened. For example, after Rebecca returns from school, she sits down with her father. Only seconds into their meal and there\u2019s a crash at the door. The father explains that he owes some men money, or something.

My reaction: \u201c\u2026 ok\u2026.\u201d

After escaping the house and running off into the woods, that is where our game begins.

Now, there really isn\u2019t too much to say about gameplay. You collect items, solve puzzles, and that\u2019s about it: pretty standard for most RPGMaker games. But your objective throughout these puzzles is not always clear. It got to the point where I\u2019d collected 10 random puzzle items and I had no idea what to do with any of them.

Oh, but there is one thing that really, really pisses me off: Cheap Deaths. They. Are. Everywhere. I must\u2019ve died at least ten times due to completely random scenarios that were unavoidable.

The game has heart, I know so, but I just don\u2019t think it\u2019s worth your time or money. However, I believe this dev is totally capable of making something great, had there been a little more time and effort put in. But until then, we\u2019ll just have to wait and see.. Before dozing off to bed and finally being able to rest after playing this nonstop from 2 am to 5 am, I figured I should write a review while it's still fresh in my mind.

First of all, did I enjoy this? Yes! Is it something everyone can enjoy? No. I'll pass on pointing out the good things for now and look at the bad things throughout, so that I can get started with how to improve it. First of all, it's full of bugs, and some scenes seem a lot like rip-offs from other rpg horror game(ex: in the opening you learn that your mother died and you ask your father to go visit her grave tomorrow). There was a lot of frustrating scenes in it which were really hard to figure out on your own. No clues were given for them what-so-ever. One example is when in the mansion I had no idea I could fill the bottle with holy water, and I had no idea I even needed holy water! The game does not tell you "go get holy water", no, it just leaves you alone wandering around trying to find what to do next. It also has a lot of tile and clipping errors. If I had a penny for everything I could walk over in this game, I would be one of the richest men of my country. It also has a lot of spelling and grammar errors. At times sentences aren't started with capital letters, and at one point in the game you see that the word "orphan" has been spelled as "orphin". The maps are empty and bland, and unnecessarily huge, and there are a lot of tiles error like I mentioned. Why did the bookshelves have additional bookshelves below them? It did not make sense, and there were gaps too. Light effects felt cheap, most of the time they went over walls and they had no blur to them what-so-ever, and that's not how lights work in real life at all. You can also interact with things even when not facing them. Also the final scene with lots of monsters was just, way too hard. It took me like 50 attempts trying to get all endings(atleast I didn't die at all with the true ending X3). The game also teaches you that angel statues save, however later on there are angel statues in the game that don't do anything. If they won't do anything, why did we learn about them? One other thing is, the developer does not know how to remove party members from the looks of it. Even after he died and when you fell down the well Jacob is still in your party, and also, one game breaking bug I found is when you go to the room where you place the dagger after forging it, returning to the big library will cause the flashback to reset.

So why did I like this?

Honestly, no idea myself. It had lots of flaws, and needed a lot of polishing, but something about me just really wants to like this game. Is it my sense of being way too easily impressed? Is it my love for these kinds of games? Something about it really drew me into it, and I thought it was really bad, but in the same time I thought it was good. Honestly, with a few bug fixes and a little more dialog improvement this could be made into something great. It really has that potential. I did a 3 part let's play on it, and I will share the playlist when all parts are done uploading. It had good scenes, and some parts that were actually pretty good, like the library and the crypt. Although I don't see how Jacob died. All Rebecca had to do was move down 1 tile and because she's an idiot Jacob pushed her out of the way instead, and if you tihnk of it, if Jacob can move up three tiles to save Rebecca she should be able to move down one tile too. There were some nice death scenes along the game but also some that are plain lame. For example in the sewers if you enter a room you will be killed by a goblin. No warning was given for this at all, and you did not get to save before it either. I could clearly see that this game follows WilliamTheUnproPro's Let's Make A Rpg Horror Game tutorials on youtube, and one map is just a plain rip-off of it.

Again, I'm saying it. This game isn't for everyone. This isn't a professional rpg maker game that really stands out, it's very amateur. If you do not like buggy games made by newbie developers don't get this, but I played it and liked it quite a lot, despite the fact of pointing out more cons than pros.. It's an okay RPG, there is a long scene in the beginning that doesn't let you do anything other than read and watch, which I know there is many RPGs that do that, but this one is a bit bland in the story content of the beginning. You also have no direct point of what you need or what to grab, it's mainly just hope you find something and get it right or risk starting all over if you have no multisaves. Rebecca, the main character, is a little bland and too cheerful and doesn't seem to really have much depth into her, just random 'things' that come to her as she explores the forgotten forest after being forced to run into it. There isn't much more I can say on this, but... yeah it's up to the person to buy it or not, but I say there are better RPGs out there, but if you're one to just play all of them then go ahead.. I like it. There are some parts of the game that was hard to figure it out. And the endings are well hidden. Nice rpg story. :)

The Forgotten Forest starts off with a little girl asleep in some grass, awoken by the wind blowing.

Why yes, Creator, I HAVE played The Witch's House!

To be fair, at least here she's just at school and is called inside from... recess? Truancy? It's very unclear. This is a good indicator that the game is ah.. 'inspired' by some of the more popular RPG Maker Horror games. Along with the tiny price tag, it's clear this game isn't going to be the next Ib or something.

One scene that was sort of interesting was right after the introduction. An old lady walks into the classroom, and begins rattling on about how The Forgotten Forest is super evil, not to go inside it, and then talks about a bunch of strangely specific myths about it. The Rage of the Ghost, Mansion of Blood. Sounds like Levels to me. Anyway, then there is kind of an okay spook moment when a kid asks who the hell she is and why she is telling them all this random stuff. Then a kind of jumpscare and we fade to Little Girl going home. It gave me some hope, alright?

Of course, this is kind of undermined when Little Girl goes home, and her father randomly tells her some debt collectors are coming to take her away moments into dinner. Thanks, Dad! Naturally, the only way to escape is into the evil forest everyone lives beside. I think they were asking for it, honestly.

What follows is an almost comedic journey through Wonderland if it was like a Disney spook tour. I myself asked "Why?!" out loud at a few random things happening, and even Little Girl asked the same thing. With my newfound connection to her, I decided to get her out of this alive... After seeing all the cheap deaths to get the maximum amount of game out of this.

The gameplay is ok, I guess. You find things to rub on other things to create progress. Sometimes rubbing a thing on another thing kills you because reasons, and you need another thing. If you've played any other RPG Maker Horror game, then you've played this. There are a dozen or so areas where you can walk on the wall because they weren't made solid, or something.

The 3 Endings are less based on how well you do in the game, or saving people, or anything really. When you are in the last area, there are 3 Things, and each one gives you an ending, so you can see all 3 in like 10 minutes or so.

Anyway, it's worth a grab if you want to spend 2-4 hours on something to get your creative juices flowing for a roleplay character. Or if you just like these sorts of games THAT MUCH.. So far I am enjoying this, but I am terrible at remembering things, so sometimes it gets a little frustrating. Otherwise, I like it. Here is a Let's Play I'm still going through. I'd probably have an easier time if I weren't rushing as well!
